School of thought

Being aware of cognitive biases can help us make better investment decisions.

Every day, we make thousands of decisions; some put that number as high as 35,000.<sup>[1]</sup> The vast majority are routine and without especially big consequences – but then there are the ones that matter a lot more.

Choices about investments generally fall into the “important decisions” category because what we buy, when we buy, how long we hold it and when we sell can have a significant impact on long-term financial well-being.

Yet every decision, large and small, can be influenced by myriad cognitive biases. Many of these are hard-wired into our brains to help us manage all that exhausting decision making and, in some cases, make life-or-death decisions extremely quickly.

“[Cognitive biases] are an evolutionary adaptation,” explains Dr. David Lewis, PhD, chief client officer at the behavioural economics consulting firm BEworks. “Our brains have evolved to have a very fast, non-analytical way of thinking. When confronted with danger, it doesn’t make a lot of sense to sit down and analyze what to do. It usually makes more sense to just do anything rather than deliberate.”

The trouble is that mental shortcuts, known as heuristics, can lead us to make decisions that impact us in negative ways. The good news, says Lewis, is that simply being aware of the fact that cognitive biases exist can make us pause, engage in “metacognition” (thinking about thinking) and start to make better decisions.

Who wants to lose?

You’re invited to lunch with someone who can make your career – but you hesitate. What if you spill food on your lap? What if you have a coughing fit? Do the risks outweigh the benefits? Maybe it’s safer to turn the offer down.

One of the cognitive biases that can lead investors astray is loss aversion. No one wants to lose. And, in fact, people are said to feel the pain of a market loss twice as intensely as they feel the joy of a market gain.<sup>[2]</sup> However, loss aversion can lead to decisions that harm long-term investment returns.

If you don’t want loss aversion to govern your decision making, it’s worth making a clear division between the money you’re growing for the long term and the money you need to cover shorter-term spending and emergencies. A short-term loss matters a lot if you need to access your money tomorrow – but it shouldn’t be the primary reason for an investment decision in an account that’s geared towards long-term growth.

Just how sure are you?

You’re looking for a new stove, so you pick your model and then scan websites searching for the best price. You find a great deal – but you wait. Surely prices will drop further, you think. A friend who works at the store says, “Buy now – that’s as low as you’ll find it!” You ignore them, convinced you know best, and then prices go up instead of down.

Some investors can be overconfident, believing they can predict the markets better than they really can. That can lead them to try to time the market – attempting to buy at the bottom and sell at the top. They may overtrade, incurring expenses that diminish their returns and ignoring the risks associated with active trading. Overconfidence can also mean they won’t listen to anyone else’s opinion.

One strategy to overcome the overconfidence bias is to deliberately pause before acting on the assumption that you know best. Take the time to think through the repercussions of what you’re about to do – good and bad. Consider the possibility that your decision may put your long-term planning at risk – for example, delaying the date you can retire.

Finally, make a conscious effort to listen carefully to what others are saying, even if it disagrees with your view. Keep in mind, says Lewis, that research shows people who have received professional training in investment management, economics and finance tend to be more rational, less emotional decision makers – so your advisor is worth paying attention to.

The Royal Canadian Legion – Branch #020 would like to thank the generous citizens and businesses of Rocanville and community for your support during the 2019 Poppy Campaign. As a result of this generosity, our Legion is able to ensure that veterans and their families are cared for and treated with the respect that they deserve. Spending of Poppy Trust Funds is strictly controlled with appropriate approval processes. The Poppy Trust Fund primarily serves the necessities of veterans and their dependents as well as approved services within our community. This includes regular donations to the Dial-a-Van, support of air cadets, purchase of medical equipment for long term care facility as well as community medical appliances, educational bursaries, and funding for veteran transition programs.

We are very grateful to the volunteers who assist us in many ways with the Remembrance Day service and the school Poster and Literary contest entries and judging. Youth involvement ensures that Canada never forgets. The continued community support allows us to honour Canada's veterans – past and present.

Sincere thanks,

Services information include: mental health, senior services, basic needs, healthcare, and much more!

- Services over the phone are available in over 175 languages, including 17 Indigenous languages.

- When accessing the phone, text, e-mail or web chat options, the community navigator helps people get to the root of their issues, search the database for the best service for them, and make the connection.

United Way Regina and United Way Saskatoon & Area have made investing in 211 Saskatchewan a top priority under the focus of building strong communities and connecting people to supports.

I'm seeking connect with Town of Rocanville to help residents learn about the 211 SK service. We would be happy to provide free 211 SK pamphlets, posters, and business cards to distribute to people and can provide custom presentations to your staff and residents upon request. If there is a chance, we would appreciate if 211 SK information could be added to your town's website, newsletter or other publications.

Thanks in advance,
